

OFF LIMITS

SEE YOU AT THE MOVIES: Californians are fleeing to Colorado in record numbers, but word apparently hasn't reached Hollywood. Although current release Unlawful Entry offers an up-to-the-minute psycho L.A. cop, it's way behind on Denver vacancy rates. When explaining to investors why his nightclub rent is so high, Kurt Russell shrugs and says, "Hey, this isn't Denver," then notes that all the downtown buildings in the Mile High City are vacant because of bad oil-and-gas investments. Sounds like appropriately named screenwriter Lewis Colick lost a bundle on one.

Or maybe the folks at 20th Century Fox, which released the movie, haven't quite recovered from the reign of former Coloradan Marvin Davis. The expatriate oilman is still doing some digging here, though; private investigator R.W. "Pete" Peterson—of Denver and L.A.—has been hired to track down a few people who left Davis high and dry in the old days. Peterson's also exercising his own Hollywood option, serving as "technical adviser" to screenwriter B.J. Nelson on his new movie set in Denver, which involves the FDIC and assorted S&L shenanigans. Peterson's been promised a part as "chief of security."

Perhaps Neil Bush can appear as himself, with a cameo by H. Ross Perot offering George Bush a "friendly warning" about his boy's Silverado seat back in 1986. According to the Washington Post, Bush sent Perot a note thanking him for his concern and noting that his kids "are all straight arrows uninvolved in intrigue."
